CCRITICAL THINKING EXERCISES (Also in the textbook at the end of the chapter).

1) The U.S. Supreme Court receives about 7,000 appeals every year, the majority of which are disposed of when the U.S. Supreme Court decides not to hear the case because of the subject matter, or if it is not significant enough to merit court review. The decision to hear a case is made when the justices meet to review all cases. In order for all of the justices to hear a particular appeal, the case must pass a screening, which is known as the Rule of Four. This means that at least four of the nine justices must agree that the case has constitutional merit or national importance and that it should be heard by the entire court. If a case receives four or more votes from the justices, it is placed on the docket and scheduled to be heard. Annually, only about 100 or so cases pass the Rule of Four and are placed on the docket for an opinion. Should this rule be changed? Should the SCOTUS hear more cases considering that they receive almost 7,000 appeals every year? Perhaps a Rule of Two, or even if just one of the justices agrees that a case is important, the court should hear the arguments in the case. Should the highest court in the land weigh in to ensure justice is served in more cases than they currently do?

2) Attorney–client privilege affords defense counsel with considerable protection about the information that a defendant has shared with them. If you were an attorney and your client confessed to you that they were fully or partly involved in the crime, what would you do? Would you vigorously fight the prosecution’s case, encourage your client to seek a fair plea bargain, or decide you don’t really care what happens to the defendant and not put forth any effort in the case? Would this depend on the type of crime the defendant admitted to?

CASE STUDY DECISION-MAKING EXERCISE (Also in the textbook at the end of the chapter).

1) Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia was found dead in his sleep on a ranch in Texas, in early 2016. Immediately, President Obama announced he would nominate someone to fill the vacancy. Senate Republicans, however, knowing that Obama was in his last year in office, vowed not to confirm anyone until a new president was elected. This vacancy had an effect on the outcomes of several cases that were set to be decided by the court in its term. For example, in the case of United States v. Texas, the question was whether an executive action by President Obama toward immigration reform that would stop the deportation of unauthorized immigrants through his Deferred Action of Parents of Americans (DAPA) program was constitutional. Having only eight justices on the court resulted in a 4–4 tie, which meant that the U.S. Court of Appeals decision to block the executive action would stand. In another case, Friedrichs v. California Teachers Association, a 4–4 vote was a win for organized labor because it meant that the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals decision would be affirmed. The case involved a group of California teachers who argued that having to affirmatively opt out of the union each year or pay their fees for collective bargaining is a violation of their First Amendment rights. The U.S. Court of Appeals agreed with the district court that precedent allowed the teacher’s union to engage in this practice, so those choosing not to join would have to opt out annually or pay the union dues. Without a ninth justice, the 4–4 tie affirmed the lower court’s decision that favored the union. Should the rules be changed so that if there is a vacancy at the SCOTUS it must be filled in a timely manner so that there are no 4–4 tie decisions that an odd-numbered justice court was set up to avoid? Did these individuals waste their time appealing to the U.S. Supreme Court and did their cases get denied fair appellate review because the court had a vacancy and the Senate refused to confirm a new justice? Should the court stop making decisions on cases until the Senate ensures they are fully staffed?
