CHAPTER 1

WHY A COURSE IN HUMAN SEXUALITY?

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

LO 1.1 Describe cultural perspectives that differ from your own regarding sexual behaviors and attitudes.

LO 1.2 Identify the historical influences of Judaism, the ancient Greeks and Romans, Christianity, the Victorian era, and the sexual revolution on contemporary attitudes about sexuality.

LO 1.3 Explain the process of socialization and how the media has become an omnipresent influence on sexual socialization.

LO 1.4 Identify the contributions of Sigmund Freud, Henry Havelock Ellis, Alfred Kinsey, and Masters and Johnson to the field of sexuality.

LO 1.5 Describe the uses and limitations of scientific methodology.

LO 1.6 Summarize the history of sexuality education.

POTENTIAL PROBLEMS

Early Christian beliefs regarding sex were very negative and still influence modern Christian thought. However, in reviewing this history, be careful that your lecture is not interpreted as a general condemnation of religion. If students become defensive about their own religious beliefs, it might possibly make them less open to examine other topics related to human sexuality. Point out that religious views regarding sexuality are constantly evolving and that the views at the clergy level are often less harsh than official dogma. While the official teachings on sexuality of various Christian institutions tend to be more conservative, a diversity of views on sexuality may be represented by scholars from these traditions. Examples from the Catholic tradition include Farley 2006; Curran & McCormick 1993; and Kosnik et al., 1977.

Some students may have reservations about whether sexuality is a subject suitable for scientific study. Be sure to point out that the purpose of scientific research is to generate factual information, and emphasize that it is morally neutral. Scientific results cannot say if a particular attitude or behavior is moral or not, or even if it is advisable. They can determine, however, whether a majority of people believe a particular behavior to be moral or advisable. It may be helpful to set some guidelines for class discussions (e.g., listen to each other's views; be respectful of differences; don't judge).

CHAPTER SUMMARY

1.1 Describe cultural perspectives that differ from your own regarding sexual behaviors and attitudes.

- What is normal is defined by the community in which you live. A person who is ethnocentric views their own culture's behaviors and customs as correct or as the way things ought to be.
- Cultures differ in what they find sexually and physically attractive and in their sexual behaviors and attitudes. Cultural preferences also change over time.

- Within each subculture in the United States, several factors can influence sexual attitudes and behaviors, including religion, level of education, and socioeconomic status.

1.2 Identify the historical influences of Judaism, the ancient Greeks and Romans, Christianity, the Victorian era, and the sexual revolution on contemporary attitudes about sexuality.

- In the strongly patriarchal Hebrew society, daughters and wives were regarded as property (of fathers or husbands), and there were many rules to guarantee that material property was passed on to legitimate offspring.

- The ancient Greeks and Romans placed a strong emphasis on marriage and the family, but Greek and Roman men were allowed considerable sexual freedom outside marriage.

- Christian theology separated physical love from spiritual love. The views of the early Christians regarding sex were partly the result of an attempt to keep order in the face of the sexual excesses and debauchery during the decline of the Roman Empire. Saint Augustine had a tremendous influence on the antisexual attitude of the Catholic Church.

- The 19th century Victorian era was an era of public prudery and purity. All pleasurable aspects of sex were denied.

- The Industrial Revolution, the emergence of the women's rights movement, and the introduction of the birth control pill and IUD caused American society to enter the sexual revolution. In the latter part of the 20th century, this caused a marked decrease in the average age at which Americans first engaged in sexual intercourse, a dramatic increase in the number of lifetime sexual partners, and pressure not to abstain from premarital sex but to engage in it.

1.3 Explain the process of socialization and how the media has become an omnipresent influence on sexual socialization.

- Socialization is the way a society shapes individual behaviors and norms. Socializing agents, the social influences that shape behaviors, include parents, peers, school, religion, and the media.

- The sexually related messages received by young people from different branches of the mass media—television, movies, radio, music, magazines, and tabloids—are omnipresent and pervasive and generally greater than the influences of all other socializing agents combined.

- Many advertisements use sexual appeals to sell their products.

- Teens who watch television shows, music videos, or movies with a lot of sexual content are more likely to begin having sexual intercourse earlier than other adolescents.

1.4 Identify the contributions of Sigmund Freud, Henry Havelock Ellis, Alfred Kinsey, and Masters and Johnson to the field of sexuality.

- Perhaps more than anyone else, Sigmund Freud demonstrated the influence of sexuality on human life by discussing sexuality as a primary motivation for behavior.

- The work of physician and sexual researcher Henry Havelock Ellis was particularly important for its emphasis on the wide range of human sexual behaviors and for promoting the belief that behaviors such as masturbation and homosexuality should be considered normal.

- Research by Alfred Kinsey and colleagues opened the door to a whole new field of research. Through surveys and interviews, they found that most people masturbated, that many people engaged in oral-genital sex, that women could have multiple orgasms and that many men had same-sex sexual experiences.

- William Masters and Virginia Johnson were the first to directly observe and record the physiological responses in humans engaged in sexual activity under laboratory conditions.

1.5 Describe the uses and limitations of scientific methodology.

- Scientific methodology such as surveys, correlational studies, direct observations, case studies, and experimental research can be used effectively to study human sexual behavior.
 - Research begins by specifying the population, the complete set of subjects. If the population is large, a sample (subset) must be selected.
 - Surveys can be conducted as in-person interviews or paper-and-pencil or online questionnaires, but responses may not always be truthful because of socially desirable biased responding.
 - Correlational studies attempt to determine whether one variable changes in the same way (positive correlation) or the opposite way (negative correlation) as another. Correlation does not determine causation.
 - Direct observations of people's behavior eliminate the problem of determining truthfulness, but is subject to the observer effect.
 - Experimental research uses the experimental method to systematically manipulate an independent variable while keeping all other variables the same. This method allows for the determination of causation.
- 1.6 Summarize the history of sexuality education.
- What is believed to be factual about children's sexuality depends on the culture and the era, so young people are taught differently in different cultures and time frames.
 - In the United States, sex education in schools originated in the early 20th century as part of a social hygiene movement to prevent rising levels of sexually transmitted infections and was directed primarily at boys.
 - The debate over sex education curriculum is between abstinence only programs and comprehensive sexuality education.

From the It Gets Better Project, which aims to uplift and empower LGBTQ+ youth.

GUEST LECTURES

Invite campus religious leaders (of different denominations) to class to give their religions' contemporary views on various sexual issues. You might ask students to interview representatives from their own religious traditions about views on various sexual issues and to bring this material back to present in class. You might also recruit students from different cultures to do the same thing.

CLASSROOM ACTIVITIES/DISCUSSION

1. Ask the students how they scored on the Sexual Knowledge Quiz (pp. 3–4). We created the quiz, but there are several others you might want to use as well. June Reinisch of the Kinsey Institute published an 18-item “Sex Knowledge Test”: Reinisch, J. M. (1990). The Kinsey Institute New Report on Sex: What You Must Know to Be Sexually Literate. New York: St Martin’s Press. Students can compare their grades with those of a national sample. Reinisch found that most Americans received a “D” or “F” on this test.
2. Have students discuss their feelings about sex for (1) reproductive purposes and (2) for pleasure only. Many students will indicate that they have a positive attitude about sex for pleasure, but test their true feelings by asking how they feel about their parents or grandparents having sex for pleasure, having sexual intercourse in different positions, having oral-genital sex, and so on. (This topic is covered in Chapter 10.)
3. Have students discuss the moral values and principles about sex taught to them by their parents and others as they were growing up. Do they still apply to their lives now as an independent adult? If so, are they comfortable living by them? If not, how have their values changed?
4. Have students list examples of sexual repression and sexual permissiveness in their own communities.
5. Have students discuss how the media have influenced their own sexual behaviors and attitudes. The biggest problem that might be encountered here is getting students to acknowledge the cumulative effect of years of exposure to sexually oriented material on television and radio, and in movies, magazines, and advertisements.
6. Have an open discussion of the students’ views about the meaning of “sex” and “had sex.”
7. Have the class construct their own questionnaire by each contributing a question or two. Read the questions to the class, and discuss the problems with obtaining valid results. Generalize the discussion to the problems that sex researchers face in their own studies.
8. Have the class to design a research study. Suppose you want to study the progression of sexual intimacy in dating couples. You are interested in knowing how long, on average, the two people have known each other or have been dating when they first engage in various intimate behaviors (kissing, erotic touching, nudity, genital touching, oral sex, intercourse). What kind of study would you propose? How would you obtain subjects? Exactly how would you go about gathering your data? What methodological problems do you think you might encounter?
9. Students could design a survey study by choosing a type of survey, wording survey questions, deciding on a sample population, and choosing where to conduct their survey. Students could talk about potential problems in their research including sampling procedures, memory recall, respondent bias, volunteerism bias, and low response rate.

OUTSIDE ACTIVITIES

1. Have students monitor TV programs, music they listen to, social media, and the news for references to sexual topics. Do this for two or three days or longer. Have them to classify the references as positive, negative, or neutral.
2. Have students examine advertisements (e.g., from magazines or social media) to determine if the message is product information or identification.
3. Assign the students to read an article from a scientific journal (such as the Journal of Sex Research) and another article about sex from a popular magazine (such as Cosmopolitan). Have them to compare and contrast the magazines' styles. What methods are used to collect data? Does the article from the popular magazine give references or validate its claims?
4. Have students contact their local elementary and/or middle schools and ask to review materials used for sex education. Have them ask how decisions are made (in the district) regarding the choice and use of these materials. Have a class discussion on how students might evaluate these materials in terms of adequacy of information presented, helpfulness to young students, and so on. What alternatives might they propose?
