Essay Questions

1. Discuss the pros and cons for two of the models of business ownership.

Student answers will vary.

Sole proprietorships offer the built-in advantage of having a single person as a decision-maker, and thus it is easier to reach decisions and there is no diffusion of responsibility because everything comes down to that one person. This is in contrast to cooperatives, where the abundance of owners can make it difficult to reach important decisions; likewise, there is diffusion of responsibility, and it can be difficult to tell who is responsible for each particular operation of the business. However, cooperatives benefit from the breadth of experience that multiple owners would bring to the table. Sole proprietorships can struggle because of their size and may have difficulty achieving economies of scale when it comes to purchases. Sole proprietorships may find themselves in bad bargaining positions with vendors. Cooperatives, on the other hand, due to their potentially larger profile and size, can access markets that smaller businesses would struggle to enter and are then in a better position to negotiate with vendors.

2. Discuss one of the myths about entrepreneurs and dispel it.

Student answers will vary.

There is a common myth that entrepreneurs are wild and reckless risk takers, willing to leave something stable and secure, in order to dive into the unknown. While there may be some entrepreneurs who do take great risks, this behavior is generally not conducive to success, whether in the short or long-term. Careful consideration is necessary for attaining success, and many do not fully abandon their previous workplaces, instead they have a backup plan in case their new endeavor does not work out. Most entrepreneurs, also, do not have in mind some revolutionary new product or service, but instead want to improve on an existing product or way of doing things. Finally, the myth that they are reckless risk takers runs counter to other myths – that they are intensive researchers, have a solid business plan backed by deep pockets, and are highly experienced in their chosen work.

Hard

3. Discuss the advantages and disadvantages to owning a franchise.

Franchises are a relatively easy way to own a business with the primary barrier being the upfront cost. Franchises are basically a business-in-a-box as they come with built-in brand recognition, established suppliers, and plenty of support/training in order to set up the business and how to grow it. However, each of these benefits has a potential downside. Having broad brand recognition means that everyone knows who you are and may attach problems with the brand in general to your business specifically. Having established suppliers takes care of several decisions, but you may be stuck with higher recurring costs, especially if you live in a different part of the country than the franchisor. Business support/training are beneficial, but the franchisor may demand certain decisions over others, and be directive regarding advertising and product/service offerings.

4. Discuss the differences between a small business owner and an entrepreneur.

Small business owners tend to seek stability over growth; expertise over innovation; and support over independence. In contrast, entrepreneurs want to strike out and create novel value with something new and exciting. Entrepreneurs want to make a new product, while small business owners want to sell an established product that people are familiar with. This is an example of differences in risk tolerance. Both are willing to take risks, but small business owners tend to limit their exposure to risk by sticking to the known.

Moderate

5. Discuss the different ways to start or acquire a new business.

Most small business owners start with building the business from scratch. This means they are responsible for everything from picking out a location to determining what kind of products/services will be offered. This type of business start-up carries the most risk, with a new venture where there may not be much support or existing customer demand. It is also possible to purchase an existing business. In doing so that business would presumably have an existing customer base, an established location, vendors, and local brand recognition. The problems with this tend to arise with the business transition, problems may be discovered regarding the business's liabilities and debts, and customers may not respond well to a new owner – they may have person loyalty and not business loyalty.
